I have major body issues, and have battled an eating disorder since I was 16. I have body dysmorphia and struggle with self worth issues, but since starting modeling the support and encouragement I have received has helped me realise I can achieve anything I set my mind to. And beauty comes in all shapes and sizes, and im slowly starting to love the body im in.

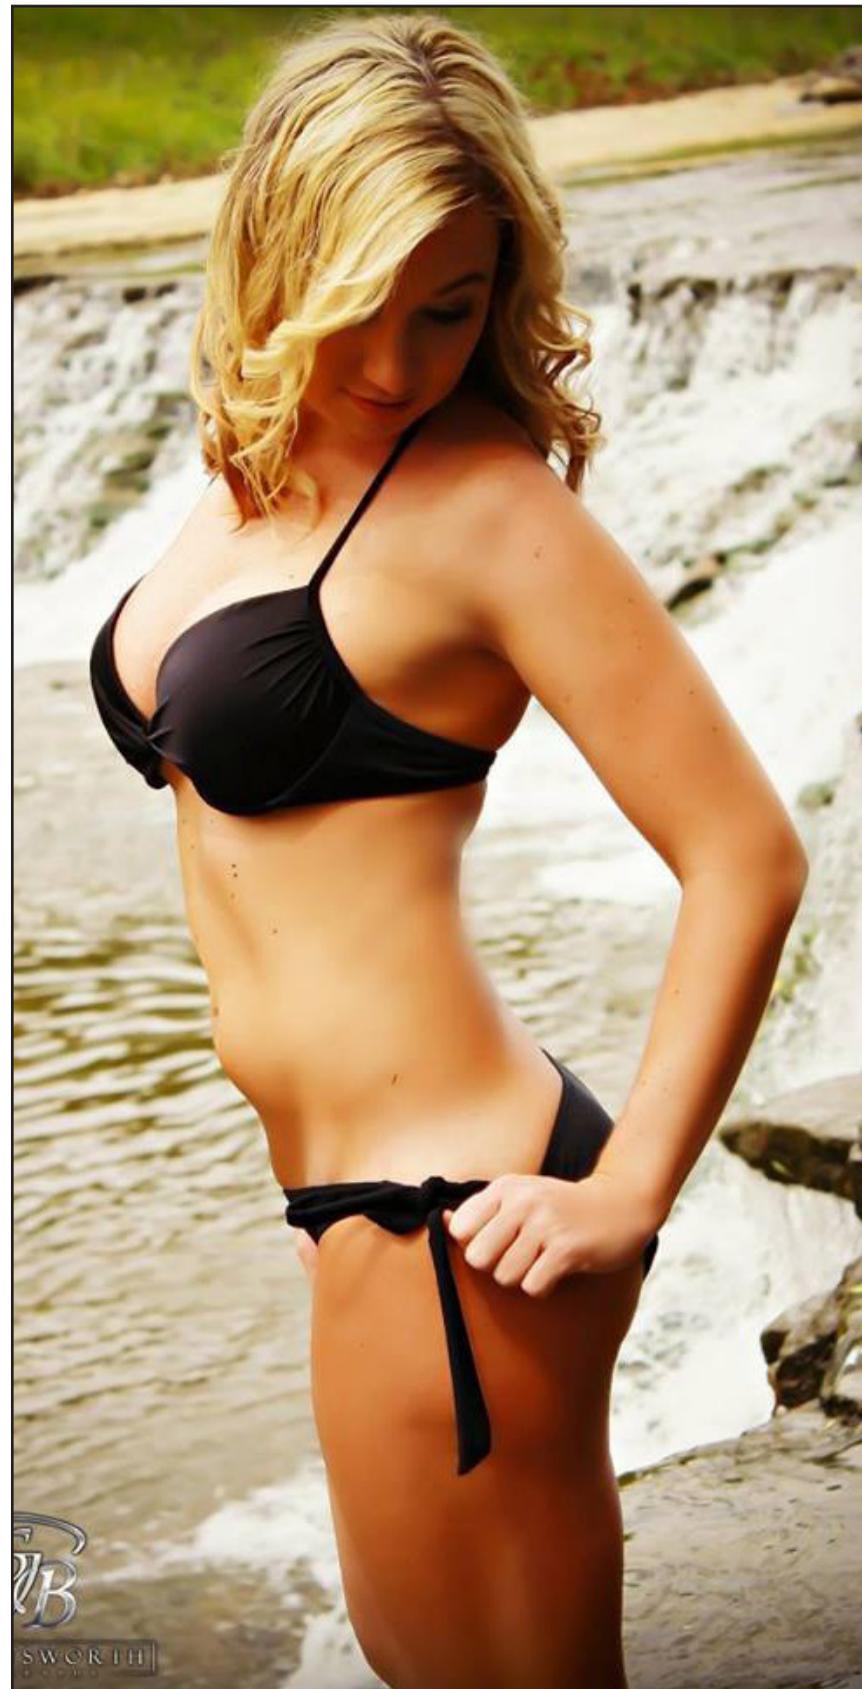

Im a busy mam to 4 amazing children. I work my ass off to make sure my kids don't go without.

Never allow anyones negative views or opinions to lessen your success and love for life. Use these as fuel to push yourself further, and never loose yourself in there negativity.

Zoe Zorka

Smart is sexy. That's the mantra for our back covergirl, Zoe Zorka, whose bikini photos are almost as impressive as her journalism portfolio. Originally from Detroit, Zoe went on to college where she studied art. She was the captain of her college cross country team and actively involved in the local art community. She also began modeling when she was 21 and in school, racking up an impressive portfolio that included print, runway, and commercial modeling. After graduating at the top of her college class and earning an MBA, she began working as a technical writer while simultaneously working on her Doctorate in Business Administration. She received her doctorate two years after she wrote her first piece for CNN. From there, her bylines grew to include Newsweek, NBC News, The National Review, Business Insider, Vice, The Source, Eater magazine, Elite Daily, and many more.

Despite being only 5'6," Zoe has managed to land a number of modeling jobs in the competition-heavy state of Utah. She credits this to her business acumen and writing experience, chalking up her success to being proactive and knowing how to market herself.

"I know that I have a very distinct look from most females in Utah. I know that I'm curvier and heavier than most models out here, but I've learned to work that to my advantage. A lot of clients out in Utah don't think they want a curvy or plus size model until I essentially sell them on me. I also take great pride in looking like my photos and being extremely professional in everything that I do."

Describing herself as "the most competitive person that she knows," Zoe describes her philosophy as doing whatever it takes to win at all costs.

"I want to be the best writer, the top model, I want all of it. I don't like to lose. The hardest thing is rejection, which happens in both writing and modeling, but I just harness that into anger, which drives me to work harder."
